Several district judges continue to defy the Supreme Court's ruling on Temporary Protected Status (TPS). The most egregious example is Judge Allison Burroughs, District of Massachusetts, appointed by Barack Obama. Judge Burroughs already prevented us from ending Somalia TPS, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's ruling. But what makes her case notable is that, after we sought emergency relief from the First Circuit, she vacated her order and entered a new one on Friday, seeking to make us start over. At this point, plaintiffs cannot win, so the whole strategy is delay, delay, delay.

Judge Beth Bloom, Southern District of Florida, appointed by Barack Obama. I am not tracking any current DHS cases in front of her, but that did not stop her from attacking me in the media last week. She described my basic factual criticisms of district judges as an "attack" on judges. Remember, district judges have called DHS officials racist, authoritarian, and worse. Yet Judge Bloom says these district judges are just "doing the very best they can," while anyone who criticizes them is engaged in "intimidation."

Fun fact: When I was in Florida, I tried a case in front of Judge Bloom defending Florida's ban on sanctuary cities. She held that the law violated the equal protection clause because, among other reasons, she thought the angel families who supported the law—people who lost family members to illegal immigration—promoted "harmful narratives." She was, of course, reversed on appeal.

Thank you for not including the judge where we beat you Friday. I realize with so very many losses, it's hard for you to choose which judge to persecute.

Countless federal judges are cowering in their basements because of this post. What a dangerous exercise of free speech.
